A Ladder to Climb

Ambitious people need to feel a sense of progress or achievement. At a company, hierarchies and ladders offer a solution to this urge to climb. The result can be mutually beneficial, merely busy-making, or at its worst, destructively competitive. Outside of the structure of a company, what ladders do you choose for yourself?

Does the ladder have an end or does it go on forever?

How do you know when you're progressing? Are the indicators internal or external?

Is the path strictly straight or is there possibility for detours?

How do you know which way is up?

BONUS:

What do you do purely for the joy, without any need for achievement?
